The train pulled out slowly out of the station. I looked out of the window and saw a family of four running towards it. The father was carrying some luggage and he was panting. A child ran next to him. The mother, carrying another child, ran behind them. They were late and looked worried. The people on the platform suggested them to slow down and take the next train. It looked like an impossible task, as the train had already started moving at a brisk pace. I remember the mother's face, as she was worried for her children's safety. One should never run after a moving train.
