When there are too many stages of component supply systems, it takes longer to deliver parts and customers often fail to be provided just in time. Without accurate demand forecasts, the company will have to store excessive parts in advance, adversely affecting the efficiency in stock management. Currently, there are some 5.83 million European consumers who drive Hyundai or Kia vehicles.

The new system integrates order data from regions and distribution centers and monitors the overs and shorts of inventories. Based on the system, Hyundai Mobis can automatically supply locally produced parts to centers which has low inventory and transfer excessive stocks to other areas.

Moreover, the duration of time needed to deliver requested parts will be reduced by six days to seven from the current 13 days under the new comprehensive management system. It can also cut inventory holding periods by 20 percent as it doesn't have to secure stocks in advance due to the automatic replenishment system.
